Food. It’s an art, a passion, something we celebrate. It brings us together and tells us we’re not so different after all. It’s how we share and how we love.

Food. It’s one of life’s greatest pleasures but, sadly, for many, food is merely part of a day-to-day struggle. Something that must be obtained and consumed in order to survive.

In America, one in six children are food insecure meaning that they often run out of food and go hungry. But the good news is, people are getting together like never before to end childhood hunger. Today, we’re here for great food, good friends and the happiness they bring.

But we’re also here to join with Feed the Children, an organization dedicated to ending childhood hunger and improving people’s lives. Working with like-minded companies, Feed the Children delivers food and essentials to partner organizations across the nation, organizations that struggling families rely on to make it through hard times.

Feed the Children promotes education with backpacks and school supplies for children who can’t afford them and runs teacher stores in five states, stores where your teachers can get the supplies they need at no cost. They also have summer feeding programs so when the school is out and lunches are no longer available, children still get the nutrition they need to grow and be healthy.

And when disaster strikes, Feed the Children is there, delivering just the kind of food and supplies families need to get back on their feet. And Feed the Children works with local communities in ten different countries to ensure that children get proper nutrition. They help children stay healthy with vitamins and deworming medications and provide clean water, promote good hygiene and health practices and help parents become self-reliant. But there’s still a lot of work to be done. Good food is the foundation to building healthy lives and promising futures and that’s why we’re here because you love great food and you understand food’s importance to everyone.