

newsworthy trends

Logging On And Getting Behind-The-Wheel

(NAPSA)—Increasingly busy lifestyles are cutting into teenagers' schedules, motivating high school students to do more online—including learning how to drive.

Growing in popularity, online driver's education classes are designed to produce safe, confident and defensive drivers.

For example, DriversEd.com was developed by instructors with more than 20 years of experience in driver education. The all-online, state-specific course satisfies the in-class driver education requirement for students seeking their first driver's license.

The curriculum is packed with lots of animated case studies, graphics, and live-action video, which bring different traffic situations and driving scenarios to life.

Music and fast-paced delivery put drivers-in-training in the driver's seat to help them recognize the causes of accidents and learn how to avoid them—featuring video appearances from renowned, professional race car drivers incorporating real-life situations.

Teens can get ready for the written DMV exam by taking up to 50 practice tests. If students don't pass the course the first time, they can retake the test until they do pass.

When the course is successfully completed, students will earn an official Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) certificate of completion of driver's education, making them eligible for a Learner's Permit and/or Driver's License and an auto insurance discount, where applicable.

Since 1997, DMV-approved DriversEd.com has been America's #1 online drivers education solution: "click" log on to enroll, "learn" start the DriversEd.com course, "drive" get your DMV certificate of completion.

Because it's online, it's possible, for the first time, for students to learn at their own pace. Teens can stop and start when they like. Protections are built in that ensure that students don't progress too quickly, and security measures are in place to protect the identity of the student. DriversEd.com also offers step-by-step instructions for obtaining a license. For more information, visit <http://www.delmar.driversed.com/>.